

Final Project: College Readiness Portfolio

Model Response

Final Portfolio Model Response

Introduction page

My name is Jordan. I am starting at the University of North Carolina at Greensboro in August, studying Business Administration, and I grew up in Rocky Mount as the first person in my family to go to a four-year university.

When I started this course, I could not have read my own financial aid award letter, and I thought office hours were optional study sessions for students who were already doing well. Two pieces of my own work show how that changed: my Module 3 budget worksheet has a line where I calculated the actual gap between my aid and my cost of attendance, a number I did not know existed in May, and my Module 1 reflection is about deciding to go to office hours in the first three weeks before I need anything, which is the opposite of what I would have done in June.

One thing I wish I had known sooner: your award letter is not your bank account balance. There is a gap, and knowing that in July is better than discovering it in October.

Module 6 section: Career Preparation

Key Takeaway. I used to think a resume was something you made senior year once you had enough experience. I did not know first-year students are supposed to have one, that a job at Cookout counts, or that LinkedIn is about being findable rather than showing off, and the biggest change was learning that I already had the material; I just was not naming it.

Completed Artifact. LinkedIn profile: linkedin.com/in/jordan-example. My one-page resume is attached as a PDF.

Revision Note. I rewrote two bullets that started with "helped" after the career center reviewed them; same job, but the new version says what I can actually do.

Action Taken or Planned. I booked a career center appointment in the Elliott University Center, Room 379, for the second week of September, and connected with two UNCG alumni in accounting on LinkedIn with a short specific message.

Strongest section

My strongest section is Module 3, the budget. I chose it over Module 6 even though I am proud of the LinkedIn profile, because the budget is where I had to be honest about a number I was afraid of. I built it from my real award letter, found a positive gap of $304 a month, and named the part I am least sure about: whether my work-study hours will actually come through. It is the section where I stopped guessing about money and started planning, and that is the change that will matter most in the fall.